The Research Course is often dreaded and feared among undergraduate students. It is resource and labor-intensive for students and faculty, alike. In fact, many institutions are doing away with this requirement for a baccalaureate degree. For those who are still able to take (or teach) it, communication about its requirements, goals, purpose, and recipe for success is imperative. In this panel, former students (and their professor) discuss challenges, triumphs, and tips for approaching this course so that each student completes it meaningfully and successfully. Hint: Communication is key! Session Chair: Cody Clemens (Marietta College)

Panel Research Paper	A Dramatistic Analysis of Lorde's "Mood Ring" Maria Smith (Cedarville University) & Isabel Wolfe (Cedarville University) Lorde's work "Mood Ring" reveals harrowing truths about our culture's current obsession with Eastern pseudo-wellness trends. Through a dramatistic analysis of "Mood Ring", the authors of this paper uncover Lorde's purpose in writing the song and producing the music video. Lorde sees Eastern practices such as crystal wielding, yoga, and sage burning as dangerous if they begin to consume the mind of the user. She realizes that certain practices can be used as a distraction from bigger world issues. Through reviewing the current literature surrounding songs, music videos, and Eastern influences, in addition to utilizing dramatistic analysis, the meaning of Lorde's song becomes evident. The authors of this paper explain "Mood Ring's" context and its possible impact on young listeners. This work dives deep into Lorde's own life context and how it affects her purpose, and is ultimately an explanation of Lorde's critique for the current state of wellness culture. 'WandaVision': Coping With the Familiar Elizabeth Shiller (Ohio University) Marvel Cinematic Universe's Wanda Maximoff grew up like many of us, with TV. When Wanda loses her brother, Wanda retreats to sitcoms as a harmless way of coping with her grief. But when Wanda loses her husband, her grief is so large that she takes over the small town of Westview, New Jersey, trapping the townsfolk in a sitcom-esque universe. Wanda begins the series with classic 1950s sitcoms like I Love Lucy and moves through popular American sitcoms throughout the years as she moves through the stages of grief until she restores Westview in the finale along with accepting the events of Avengers: Endgame. In using the Disney+ limited series, WandaVision, this essay will illustrate how influential TV shows are to Wanda in times of extreme grief as she literally retreats into them while also illustrating how these classic sitcom tropes and misrepresentations help propel Wanda toward acceptance. Session Chair: Andrew Hunt (Ohio University)

Yet research on how young people construct contemporary social media and political experiences is lacking. This panel of two student-authored papers, designed to extend research and exquisitely connected with OCA’s “Communication at the Center” theme, reports the results of a qualitative examination of young women’s experiences with two salient aspects of contemporary life: the social, focusing on their parasocial involvement with social media influencers, but also the more politically consequential arena, with a look at their development of political attitudes as a function of political events and mediated politics. Participants’ responses will be thematically analyzed using standard textual analysis techniques. The panel will offer conclusions from these grounded surveys on how young women construct the social media, political, and political communication universe. Session Chair: Amber Ferris (University of Akron)

Panel Research Paper	Nurturing Ourselves to Death: Analyzing the Contemporary Relationship Between Man and Technology Ryan Eisenhuth (Geneva College) Of particular importance for shaping human culture is the communication technology within that culture that shapes human thought and action (McLuhan, 2001). Rather than conceiving of communication technology as a tool, Postman demonstrates that most people in our culture think of their communication technology as a friend, meaning that they have an active nurturing relationship with their communication technology (1993). Postman (2005) goes on to argue that we once “amused ourselves to death”, due to the one-way visual nature of the dominant medium of television. But the dominant technologies of today have changed to become increasingly based on two-way communication. We are now “nurturing ourselves to death” due to the active and participatory nature of these dominant technologies. In this nurturing relationship, we are distracted from essential aspects of our lives, we have lost the ability to experience solitude or make meaningful decisions for ourselves, and we have forgotten part of what makes us human. Preservice Teacher Perceptions of Video Discussions to Foster a Community of Inquiry-Does the Lear Erik Kormos (Ashland University) The creation of an engaging online learning environment where students feel a sense of belonging is a challenge for all educators. With the rise of online courses, discussion forums are commonly used to connect students with course content, peers, and instructors. However, these discussions are often text-based in nature. The purpose of this quantitative study examined preservice teacher perceptions of Flipgrid in an introductory educational technology course. Statistically significant relationships between groups were found related to two of the three components of the Community of Inquiry framework. Specifically, the findings suggest those enrolled in a hybrid course perceived Flipgrid as a more effective platform to create cognitive and teaching presence than those online. Additionally, hybrid learners were significantly more likely to use Flipgrid in their own teaching practices. In this article, an analysis of findings will be discussed and provide suggestions for future research. Session Chair: Maria Hannah (Ohio University)

“I Am Already Half Dead”, Reconceptualizing HIV: A Step Towards Normalizing HIV Communication

Roshni Ashiq (Ohio University)

HIV is gradually becoming a major public health issue in Pakistan. Country Progress Report 2020 by Global AIDS Program revealed that out of all the diagnosed cases in Sindh, 80% were children. This raised concerns and inquiry related to HIV disclosure between romantic partners and subsequent attempts for prevention via horizontal and vertical route.

Toward A Better Understanding: Analyzing Poetic Expressions from Cancer Patient’s Partners

Cody Clemens (Marietta College) & Brandon Mock (Ohio University)

Cancer introduces several complicating factors into the lives of individuals across the world. For those in romantic relationships, this illness introduces unique complicating factors that can reshape the foundation of their relationship. This project seeks to examine the ways in which romantic partners communicatively construct and reconstruct relationships after their partner is diagnosed with illness. To do this, the authors utilize poetic transcription to share stories from romantic partners of those who have previously been diagnosed with cancer. The resulting set of poems and interpretations have both theoretical and practical implications to improve understanding around romantic relationships and illness.

Workshop

Creating a Community of Learners through Experiential Practices

Clare Gross (Baldwin Wallace University); Ida Williams (Baldwin Wallace University); Sean Gilmore (Baldwin Wallace University)

This is a discussion-based short course concerning experiential learning in order to build a community of learners, ones who can take and apply the skills and knowledge into real-life contexts successfully during and post college life. Experiential learning encourages students to exercise higher thinking processes while engaging in the spirit of collaboration to successfully excel in their academic endeavors.

The workshop is interactive. Participants will be provided with a three-step process to engage students in experiential learning that creates a classroom community. The first step is to gain information through multiple methods of inquiry. The second step outlines how students become actively engaged in the experiential process through specific methods. The third step involves application; a creative process where students actively apply what they have learned. It is powerful when students share what they have learned with others outside of the classroom in conferences, videos, and other formats.

Weighing the Pros and Cons of Data Collection Via Amazon Mechanical Turk (MTurk)

Amber Ferris (University of Akron); Erin Hollenbaugh (Kent State University at Stark); Rhiannon Kallis (University of Akron); Andrea Meluch (University of Akron)

The scholars on this panel have each used MTurk to collect data and will offer the lessons learned from their experiences to engage attendees in a discussion on how to use MTurk in their own research. We will discuss some of the positive benefits as well as issues we have encountered. We will also be able to shed some light on issues such as participant pay and data cleaning. Lastly, we will also review platforms similar to MTurk to compare newer options available to researchers.

Panel Research	Discipline and Docility: A Foucauldian Analysis of Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration Policy Brandon Mock (Ohio University) As an essential component of the global economy, truckers form the backbone of the transportation industry. Recent research has illustrated adverse health outcomes for truckers as a result of the harsh labor conditions. The Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration is responsible for creating and maintaining policies to shape the health and safety of commercial motor vehicle operators. The present study conducted a Foucauldian analysis of 16 existing FMCSA federal registers and the policies associated to identify how trucker health is constituted, and how these policies enact power upon the bodies of truckers. Put Her There: Disruption Inspired Counter-Protocol at the 59th US Presidential Inauguration Amanda Taylor (Bowling Green University) This investigation considers two case studies in the context of the 59th United States (U.S.) Presidential Inauguration using Cynthia Enloe's (2014) feminist international relations (IR) theory. Inspired by Kamala Harris being elected to the U.S. Vice Presidential office, the first case uses a text as discourse method to consider the implications of the song "Hail, Columbia!" where Columbia is the toponym dedicated to a legacy of mass genocide and the lyrics of the choirs also perpetuate the ideal of the male protector. The second case describes performative placement in the phenomenon of VP Kamala Harris being directed to stand out of the place of power. This illustrated systemic problems in political protocol as VP Harris was directed by senate chairs of the inaugural committee to switch places with the second person, Douglas Emhoff, and so out of the place where a VP should stand according to past protocol. Session Chair: Maria Hannah (Ohio University)

Teaching Students Best Practices for Professional Networking Etiquette Amanda Taylor (Bowling Green University)

Have you ever felt unsure of how to act at a business networking event? Apprehensive of how to start a conversation? Skeptical of expected nonverbal communication? This workshop covers seven units that are strategically designed to help individuals present the best versions of themselves in a professional networking context. These units are titled as follows: dress and self-presentation, meetings and greetings, conversations, dining etiquette, nonverbal communication, communication technology and image management, and thank-you notes. Presenting best practices of professional networking etiquette allows participants to develop an educated consideration of self-presentation at their next networking event.

Corporate Colonization and Identity: Remote Work During the Covid-19 Pandemic

Taylor Vandervenn (University of Cincinnati)

Following the emergence of the Covid-19 pandemic, many organizations quickly shifted their employees to remote work in order to prevent the spread of the virus. Since this switch in the beginning of 2020, there have been many studies that have looked at the pandemic's effect on employees who began working from home. Based on Hoffman and Cowan's (2008) conceptualization of corporate ideology, I conduct a critical analysis of Fortune's "100 Best Companies to Work For" in 2021, using the top three organizations: (1) Cisco Systems, (2) Hilton, and (3) Wegmans Food Markets, and discuss the findings and implications. The primary research questions guiding this essay are: (1) How did corporate discourses about work during COVID-19 promote identification, and (2) what implications does this have for employees?

Relationship between Donor Motivation and Aid Effectiveness: A Content Analysis

Nuzaira Tarannum (Bowling Green State University)

Taking Dudley and Montmarquette's model of the supply of bilateral foreign aid published in 1976 into account, this paper looks at how donor motivation to provide bilateral aid has changed during the last decade and its impact on the effectiveness of the aid in economic development of the receiving country. This paper is a content analysis of articles written on Bilateral Foreign Aid published in peer-reviewed journals between 2012 and 2021. Findings suggest trade benefits and developing human rights condition in the recipient country to be the two most important factors in motivating donors resulting into reduced effect of aid money in economic development of the recipient country. Scope of future research is discussed.

The Disappearance of Bridging Social Capital: The Importance of Weak-Tie Relationships

Ryan Eisenhuth (Geneva College)

In March 2020, pandemic-related social distancing measures resulted in the closings of social gathering areas across the country for extended periods of time. This has led to a damaging of social capital in the United States, resulting in a general feeling of social isolation (Banerjee & Rai, 2020). As Mull notes, much of the social energy used during the pandemic has been "spent on keeping people tied to their families and closest friends," causing weak-tie relationships to be largely neglected (2021). Weak-tie relationships represent "bridging social capital," and are built on "episodic, single-stranded, and anonymous" interactions (Putnam, 2000). When weak-tie relationships are lost, much of the reciprocity that is characteristic of interpersonal relationships is lost (Mull, 2021). This leads to a lack of new ideas, new information, new opportunities, and new people, which can ultimately cause polarized communication, which, according to Arnett, is the "communicative crisis" of our time (1986).

More Than One Kind of Pain: An Autoethnographic Account of Endometriosis and Childlessness

Amanda Gunn (Denison University)

Approximately half of all infertile women have Endometriosis. I am one of those women. Through the combination of my autoethnographic account and analysis of pronatal discourse, I offer insight into the physical, emotional, and psychological pain that accompanied my endometriosis and my resulting childlessness. A reflection on and examination of pronatalism reveals three discursive formations that intersect to create the perfect storm of alienation and silence that mark a childless woman's life. The first formation examined is the cultural and social idealizing of "mothering." The second is made of the invisibility and or demonizing of childless women in the culture and media. The third, the most painful, are the verbal and nonverbal discourses between women that are mothers and those that are childless. The silences around childlessness bring my lived account full circle to my experiences with the unnamed and unacknowledged pain of endometriosis. This autoethnography breaks that silence.

Redlined: An Analysis of Food Insecurity in Columbus, Ohio

Elizabeth Vigue (Marietta College)

Policies enacted nearly a century ago are still powerfully shaping the communities in which we live and work today. Throughout the history of the United States, people of color have faced discriminatory laws, policies, and practices that have prevented them from building wealth and reaching higher standards of living. In this paper, I analyze the discriminatory practice of redlining in Columbus, Ohio and how it shaped the current state of food access in the area. This is done through the examination of a map of the city that juxtaposes historic redlining data with current food access data. The map illustrates the effects that institutional racism continues to have on the city of Columbus and the health of its citizens.

Women's Perceptions and Communication Strategies for Pap Screening in North-Central Nigeria: A Pilot

Nancin Dadem (Ohio University)

Cervical cancer is a major health problem in Nigeria. Though preventable, the uptake of pap screening is low. This pilot study investigated women's knowledge and experiences with pap screening and explored communicative strategies for increasing knowledge on cervical cancer and pap testing in Nigeria's North-Central region. Data consisted of interviews generated from a purposeful qualitative sample of adult female participants. An iterative approach to qualitative analysis was utilized to code and interpret data. Study findings revealed the need to improve healthcare provider communication practices, demand Nigerian government's responsibility in providing cervical cancer prevention infrastructure, and investigate interpersonal communication approaches in future research to improve knowledge and uptake of pap screening in the Nigerian context. Insights from this study will inform communication practices and intervention efforts to increase women's uptake of pap screening in North-Central Nigeria.

GIFTS
Teaching

Let's Disconnect to Reconnect

Roshni Ashiq (Ohio University)

This project is aimed at teaching students about how individuals in this shared world are different from each other yet have the same origin and thus, would establish the importance of intercultural communication. The primary purpose of this GIFTS is to make students understand that this world is a globalized place to live. Throughout our life, we come across different people. With some, we continue to stay connected based on our interests and with some we are detached due to territorial boundaries and cultural differences. However, despite all those differences, we should still appreciate the diversity and pluralism this world has to offer in order to celebrate the common origin and shared space in which we all live. Lastly, every individual has unique skill set which they bring to the table and therefore, there is a room to appreciate every being despite being divided into different and disconnected groups.

Online Discussion Leadership: Educating Today's Online Citizens

Erin Hollenbaugh (Kent State University at Stark)

Despite its potential benefits, online dialogue is often characterized by polarization, flaming language, and cyberbullying in social media. Communication instructors have the unique opportunity to help shape online communication by raising students' awareness of the importance of civil discourse and training them to positively impact the quality of online conversations. This G.I.F.T.S. presents a variety of assignments where students serve as an online discussion leader for a week to start and manage the class conversation. It can be used in online, blended, and face-to-face classes. Students will identify an artifact that exemplifies course concepts; craft a discussion starter that presents the artifact and thoughtful discussion questions; synthesize others' contributions; and, pose follow-up questions throughout the week to develop the conversation. Sample assignment descriptions and grading rubrics will be provided to session attendees, and suggestions tailored to the mode of delivery and class level of the course will be offered.

Role-Playing to Understand Seeking and Resisting Compliance

Jinx Mylo (Bowling Green State University)

In this classroom activity, students gain practice with compliance-seeking and compliance-resisting strategies by role-playing scenarios that encompass different relationships/power differentials and small and large requests. Following the role play, students reflect on which strategies they chose in each situation and if any were more successful than others.

Supposed Soliloquy and Weird Contents for Improving Confidence

Rana Batool (Ohio University)

Confidence is of the core problems in public speaking. While teaching public speaking, I tried hard to make my students comfortable while presenting their speeches. I designed this activity after a very short survey in both sections. At the end of 'Who are YOU,' I verbally asked students if they wanted to share why they were not comfortable in front of the class, and some of them told me generally about audience fear.
